

A close-up photograph of a large, cylindrical latent heat storage device. The device is composed of numerous thin, parallel metal plates stacked together. The central part of the device is cut away, revealing a complex internal structure of interconnected channels and plates, likely designed for efficient heat transfer and storage. The lighting is dramatic, highlighting the metallic surfaces and the intricate internal geometry.

CHARACTERIZATION OF A LARGE LAB-SCALE LATENT HEAT STORAGE

Maike Johnson, Konstantinos Theologou, Jonas Tombrink, Larissa Dietz, Andrea Gutierrez
DLR, Institute of Engineering Thermodynamics, Stuttgart

ISEC 2026, Graz, April 16, 2026